Enticed by the tantalizing aroma, Raven swooped down and landed on a branch of a nearby tree. He observed as the villagers savored their food, their laughter and chatter filling the air.

Raven's hunger and desire for a taste of the feast grew with each passing moment. However, he knew he had to be clever if he wanted to partake in the festivities. The villagers were wary of strangers, and Raven feared they would not be willing to share their meal with him.

As the villagers washed their hands, Raven disguised himself as a small piece of charcoal and slipped into one of their cooking pots. When the unsuspecting villagers lifted the pot from the fire, Raven emerged, his nose smudged with black soot.
