In his book, "Why They Fought: What Were They Fighting For," historian James Holland explores the motivations of the soldiers who fought in World War II. Holland interviewed hundreds of veterans from both sides of the conflict, and he draws on their stories to provide a nuanced understanding of why they went to war.

Holland argues that there was no single reason why soldiers fought in World War II. Some were motivated by patriotism, while others were motivated by a desire for adventure or a sense of duty. Some were fighting to defend their homes and families, while others were fighting for a cause they believed in.

Holland's book is a powerful and moving account of the human experience of war. It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand why World War II was fought and what it meant to the people who fought in it.

Here are some of the key takeaways from Holland's book:

- There was no single reason why soldiers fought in World War II. Some were motivated by patriotism, while others were motivated by a desire for adventure or a sense of duty.
- The experience of war was different for every soldier. Some saw combat and were traumatized by their experiences, while others served in support roles and never saw the front lines.
- War is a complex and often brutal affair. It is important to remember that the soldiers who fought in World War II were human beings, and that they deserve our respect and understanding.
